A good prompt has five parts. Put all five in before you hit send and you won't spend the next 20 minutes going in circles.

1 THE TASK
Say exactly what you want.
Start with a clear action verb. Write, find, explain, identify, summarize. Be specific — not what you're thinking about, what you actually want.

2 THE CONTEXT
Give it the backstory.
The situation, the background, what's already happened. Skip this and it guesses. It will guess wrong.

3 THE AUDIENCE
Tell it who it's for.
A new client reads differently than a long-timer. Tell it who's on the other end or it picks for you.

4 THE TONE
Tell it how to sound.
Warm, direct, professional, plain English. Also tell it what NOT to sound like. "Not corporate" is a complete instruction.

5 THE CONSTRAINTS
Set limits before you hit send.
Under 100 words. Plain English only. One option, not five. Front-load the guardrails in the prompt — not after you read something you hate.

WHAT SKIPPING THE RULES LOOKS LIKE VS. USING THEM —

WHAT MOST PEOPLE TYPE
"Write me something about our new policy for customers."

✓ WHAT ACTUALLY WORKS
"Write a 3-sentence email to long-term customers about our new 48-hour cancellation policy. Warm and direct. No corporate language. End with how to reach us."

THE PATTERN — USE IT FOR ANYTHING

[What you want] + [what it needs to know] + [who it's for] + [how to sound] + [what to keep or leave out]

If you're unhappy with what comes back, look at which of the five you skipped. That's where it went wrong.
